

ASK ABD:

No one in the organization wants to use our software? Where have we gone wrong?

There is a possibility that the software conflicts with your corporate culture. A problem like this can stem from improper implementation, or the selection of software that simply will not work with the way you do things.

The first step to solving this is to talk to the users. Find out what exactly is holding them back. Get information from them on what it would take to make them use it.

Highlight what the software can do. Try to get users excited about features that will provide them with benefits. Ask users for ideas on how the tools can be used. Train the users on how to use the software.

Corporate leaders must set an example. Encouragement must come from the top. Senior executives must support the software with their own behavior and policy setting.
